

Tips for Writing Short College Papers in History

Prof. Shaya

College of Wooster rev. 1/18

1. Remember that writing is a process. Sitting down to write your paper is only one step in this process. It will likely be unsuccessful if you attempt it without some preparation. Assuming that you have already read your sources and taken notes, the steps of the writing process are as follows:

- Brainstorm examples and ideas to develop your topic
- Develop an argument and formulate a thesis. Write down your thesis in a prominent place, lining up examples that help you make your argument
- Outline your paper as a set of paragraphs that will deliver your argument
- Draft your paper
- Read, rethink, revise your paper
- Proofread for clarity and mechanical errors

2. Develop a clear argument before you start writing. An argument answers an interesting question. It should help us to see your topic in a new light. It is summed up in the thesis of your paper, but it is more than an assertion. The argument is the thesis of your paper, plus the evidence and analysis.

3. Define your thesis carefully. Be sure you have one. A good thesis is precise, interesting, and novel. It sets out the argument of your paper in a nutshell. Generally, it stands in opposition to some other view; that is, it should be arguable. The reader should know what your thesis is early on in the paper, usually by the end of the introduction. Your thesis does not have to say everything about your argument; it only needs to set out your point of view and launch your paper.

4. Make the first paragraph count. Get to the point quickly. Don't fool around with long paragraphs of general background or vague introductions. Remember the funnel introduction? Forget about it. Avoid introductory blather about things being true throughout history. If you are at a loss for how to start your paper, you might try one of the following strategies: outline the argument that your thesis refutes, describe a problem of interpretation that you are going to shed some light upon, present a vivid example that leads to your topic.

5. Organize your paper in paragraphs. The paragraph is the building block of your paper. Give your paper a suitable design, so that each paragraph follows logically from the previous one and leads logically to the next. Include signposts in the text to make your design clear. Guide your reader through your argument with clear transition sentences.

6. Organize your paragraphs. A paragraph should be unified, coherent, and developed. It should center upon one particular question, idea, or example. The sentences should follow in some clear sequence. The central idea of the paragraph should be well supported. Generally, the first sentence of the paragraph is a topic sentence that points to the main idea.

7. Argue from evidence. Keep your unsubstantiated opinions and your feelings in the background—or save them for the conclusion. Instead, show your reader that the words of your sources support your thesis. Your evidence will typically consist of quotations from primary sources. Explain to the reader what the evidence you cite means and how it proves your thesis. An oft-repeated formula for writing fiction is: “Show, don't tell.” That is because good fiction lets readers figure things out for themselves. It doesn't constantly hit them over the head, telling them what to think. Well, the formula for the analytic essay is:

“Tell, show, then explain.” Tell your reader what it is you are trying to say, demonstrate your point with examples, then explain how your examples fit your argument.

8. Make your conclusion count. Don't merely summarize your paper. That is not a proper conclusion! Instead, tell your readers what difference your argument makes. Tell them how they should think about the topic after your argument. The conclusion can be thought of as a mini-essay that takes your paper as its starting point.

9. Write for an educated audience. Imagine that you are writing your paper for your fellow students in this class.

10. Get your facts straight. Use a textbook or an encyclopedia to get a handle on facts, events, or developments that are important to your paper.

11. Write as clearly and as forcefully as you can. Choose your words carefully. Be sure you know what they mean, especially when they have a prominent place in your paper. Avoid the passive voice. Avoid most adverbs and any use of the word “basically.” Avoid clichés, faddish expressions, filler phrases, and meaningless, outworn words and phrases. Good writing—at the sentence level—is clear, direct, and precise.

12. Give your essay a title that captures the principal idea you want to convey to your reader. A bad title: “The Industrial Revolution.” Even worse: “Paper #1” A better one: “Is this Progress?: One Worker's Experience of the Industrial Revolution.”

13. Read your paper aloud. As you write each paragraph and again when you have written all the way through your paper and again when you have finished revising your paper—read aloud. Mark the phrases that are not clear or that sound strange to your ear. Mark the places in your paragraphs where further development is needed. Mark the places in your paper where your argument jumps from one idea to another without transition. Go back, revise again. Then read your paper aloud one more time.